Equal treatment of men and women, has virtually become a civilisational norm in today's societies of the Global North, at least at the level of declarative statements. In the EU, gender is a matter of legal regulation, as discrimination on grounds of sex or sexual orientation is prohibited. In today's European institutions, gender equality is one of the fundamental principles of equality and sensitivity to other forms of discrimination in pursuing non-discrimination. The critical point here is that the issue of gender falls within the domain of human rights and the principle of sustainable societies. While some gender equality plans nominally stress that gender equality does not only mean equality for women, we can observe that within this principle, some communities, such as LGBT+, are in the background, not to mention marginalised. The gender issue is, therefore, an issue that concerns the freedoms of entire societies.
